Credit Reports Made Available Online

Experian's Move Draws Criticism From Privacy Advocates

By Robert O'Harrow Jr. and Rajiv Chandrasekaran Washington Post Staff Writers Friday, August 15, 1997; Page D01 The Washington Post

One of the country's largest credit bureaus has started allowing people to view their credit reports over the Internet, a move that some privacy advocates say increases the risk of personal information falling into the wrong hands.

Experian Inc., formally known as TRW Information Systems & Services, began offering consumers online credit reports for $8 apiece in most states Wednesday night. The service underscores how technically easy it has become fo credit bureaus and other businesses to disseminate information about millions of Americans.

People connecting to Experian's World Wide Web site can check what information is stored there about their loans, payment patterns, former addresses and other financial details -- the same personal data people have long been able t request from credit bureaus via the mail. Such reports are routinely consulted by lenders, landlords and automobile dealers to determine the creditworthiness of potential customers.

To protect against unauthorized access, Experian's service requires each person requesting his or her report from the site at www.experian.com to provide a Social Security number, one former address, a personal credit card number an other personal details. To deter eavesdropping, the information is electronically scrambled when it's sent over the Internet.

But privacy advocates yesterday voiced concern about the service -- believed to be the first of its kind to appear on the Web -- because they fear it's not secure enough. They contend that the company's security measures could be inadequate against identity thieves, criminals who use another's personal information to pose as that person and comfraud.

"That's the very worst thing they could do," said David Szwak, a Louisiana attorney who specializes in cases involvi identity theft. "They'll be facing a lot of litigation."

"The potential for abuse is there," said Beth Givens, project director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonproficonsumer group in San Diego. "It would be possible for a determined identity thief to get a lot of this information."

Although no exact figures are available, rederal law enforcement officials say such fraud is on the rise.

The Social Security Administration, facing pressure from Congress, in April shut down a service on its Web page th allowed people to access their "Personal Earnings and Benefits Estimate Statements," records commonly used in retirement planning. The site required users to provide their name, Social Security number, address, place and date o birth and mother's maiden name. Critics argued that such information is readily available from public sources.

Some privacy and consumer groups yesterday applauded Experian's initiative, saying computer access will make it easier for people to review financial data collected about them. The simplied access will encourage people to correct errors in their credit reports, the advocates said. Errors can cause such problems as rejection of loan applications.

"People have a right to that information," said Marc Rotenberg, director of Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington-based advocacy group. "This information is widely disseminated for all sorts of purposes." He supports new service.

Officials at Equifax Inc. and Trans Union Corp., two other major credit bureaus, said they haven't launched similar services because they don't want to risk a breach of privacy.

To obtain a credit report through the mail, a person must submit less information -- previous addresses and bank account numbers are not needed, for instance -- because the document is sent to an address listed in the report. Credi reports do not contain Internet addresses, making it more difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain who is receiving the information online.

"We're still not convinced the security and confidentiality can be maintained online," said Dave Mooney, a spokesma at Equifax.

Experian officials disagreed, and said consumer demand influenced their decision to offer the service. "What we're offering is secure access to information that is vital," said Don DePamphilis, vice president for electronic commerce Experian, adding that more than 17,000 people recently sent the company e-mail expressing interest in having access online reports.

Experian officials said they delayed opening the Web site for several months to address privacy concerns, but that th now feel comfortable with the protections they offer. "We have to be realistic. This is how consumers conduct their personal business and we feel that we really want to meet that need," said Maxine Sweet, the company's vice preside for consumer education. "We can't stay in the dark ages."

The company charges less for online copies of credit reports in four states, including Maryland, where the fee is $5.

In another move that has rankled some privacy advocates, Experian has asked a federal judge for permission to assemble and sell mailing lists based on information from individual credit records.

An Experian executive, George Jurkowich, said the firm wants to offer a service that would allow its clients, particularly retailers, to generate mailing lists of customers who use credit cards. It would enable, for example, a merchant who has recorded the credit-card numbers of people who have purchased tents to get customers' addresses the store can send them catalogues for other camping equipment.

In a 1993 settlement with the Federal Trade Commission, Experian agreed to limit the information it provides about consumers in marketing lists. The company, however, asked a U.S. District Court judge in Texas on Wednesday to amend that agreement because a competitor in the credit-reporting business, Trans Union, is selling such lists after refusing to settle with the FTC.

Assembling such lists is "going behind people's backs," said David Medine, the FTC's associate director for credit practices. "If you want information from consumers, you should ask for it." A Trans Union spokesman did not return phone calls yesterday.

@CAPTION: Those requesting a credit report must fill out a form on Experian's Web site.
